JOB MARKET PAPER

“Electricity Price Regulation and the Cost of Reducing Carbon Emission”

I analyze how price regulation changes the welfare effects of carbon emission policies. Specifically this paper shows that electricity price regulation in China substantially increases the cost of reducing carbon emissions. I set up a simple general equilibrium model where the price of the carbon intensive sector (electricity) is regulated and examine the welfare impact of a revenue-neutral carbon tax. The model shows price regulation has a direct cost effect and also changes the secondary cost effects caused by pre-existing taxes. I then construct a static CGE model where the parameters are calibrated using stylized facts about the economy of China in 2007. My central estimate shows the marginal cost of achieving a 20% reduction in CO₂ emissions is 22% higher in the presence of pre-existing taxes than in a world with only a carbon tax. Price regulation raises the marginal cost of CO₂ reduction by a further 27%, on top of the distortion caused by pre-existing taxes.
